a. Which of the above strategic objectives were met?

The workshop met all the objectives. The afternoon session of the workshop were developed in alignment with CRRF Doing the Right Thing learning resource. MCoS utilizing this resources and produced an activity called: immigration, refugees and internment simulation. Students engaged with peers as they participated in activities exploring identity, intercultural relationships, power, privilege, racism, and discrimination.
Racism affects each person differently, a variety of activities was chosen to help participants understand the nature of racism. From Mingling, which allows participants to be in their bodies, become familiar with the space and each other in a non-threatening way, and trust building activities to the power dynamics of bully/victim/bystander and the stereotyping simulation of sticky labels, students learned how to develop an awareness of racial discrimination while interacting with each other. Furthermore, students’ conceptions of the effects of colonization on First Nations people were challenged through the colonization simulation. Facilitated by Rhonda Rosenberg, Executive Director of MCoS, and Thom ACT leaders, students took on family roles in order to interact with “European colonizers”. Through the interplay of contact, trade, land negotiations, treaty signing and Residential School attendance, students gained practical knowledge and understanding of Canada’s troubled past and present with Indigenous people.

In addition, role-play was used as a vehicle for understanding the experiences certain Canadian ethnocultural communities, immigrants and refugees endured. This activity was inspired by work done by The Canadian Race Relations Foundation as a part of an initiative to “realize a national framework for understanding Canadian diversity”. The Immigration, Refugee and Internment Simulation allowed students to experience the discriminatory policies of the Canadian government “Immigration Officials” who decided their fate based on historical information. Students were engaged in all activities and ended the day with a circle where they shared many aspects of learning, connection and hope.

b. Please assess the strategic impact. Describe why (or why not) the event was a success? How did you measure the success? What metrics were used to measure success? (Please do not exceed half a page.)

All participants plunged mind and body into the day’s events lead by capable leaders from Thom’s ACT team and MCoS. During the workshop students learn and share in a safe and supportive environment where the individual is respected and valued for their unique personal experience and contribution. Whilst encouraged to look within themselves and their community, the past, their present and the future; they learn through the practice of critical listening and thinking that identity finds supplementary value in interdependence and an understanding of social responsibility. Although the workshop is built on a set agenda, themes, supported activities and conversations; students take on shared responsibility before, during and after the workshop to identify and assess challenges to their own and their community’s wellness. During the workshop students develop a deeper understanding of their community and learn skills and strategies that will serve them towards a healthy life.

Success was measured by how leaders were inspired and support leadership capacity amongst students and school staff to recognize and reject racism through individual and social change and growth. The event foster interaction amongst a diverse group of students across multiple differences, including culture, language, gender, ability, religion, sexual orientation etc. and to understand and value shared responsibility to promote respect across those differences. At the end of the workshop student and leaders provided feedback and 102 evaluation form were collected. Highlight from students evaluation:

- Apply what they learned to everyday life and be nice even when no one is watching
- To be more aware of labelling people and to respect people
- Not to be racist or stop people from being racist
- To tell people to respect each other
- Be the change you wish to see in the world
- Stay in ACT and educate others
- “I won’t be racist and stereotypes others”
- Joined ACT
c. How can this event be improved in the future?

Based on students evaluation for lunch time to be given the option to stay in the gym or to leave. Student would have appreciated break time. As well as more physical activities, less sitting and more fun games.
